Less than half of the Israeli public believes that Israel will be able to prevent Iran from becoming a nuclear power, a study released by the Institute for National Security Studies at Tel Aviv University has found.

Overall, the study found that the majority of Israelis are far more concerned about social challenges and internal rifts than any external threat.

The data shows that 66% of Israelis are more concerned about internal social threats than external ones and only 27% said the opposite.

Some 43% of respondents stated that they are most concerned about the tension between Arabs and Jews in Israel.
