

Former security official: These steps should be taken by powers against Iran

Hayman also answered questions regarding the Iran nuclear deal, which was shelved in 2018 when Trump took office and has yet to be reinstated, despite efforts from both sides.

Former Israeli Colonel (res.) Tamir Hayman, who served as former head of the National Security Agency and director of the Institute for National Security Studies, was interviewed Monday on Ben Caspit's Vinon Magal program on 103FM regarding the drone strike at a military factory producing ammunition in Isfahan, Iran, as well as the nuclear agreement.

"This attack in Isfahan is important, regardless of who carried it out, because very important security infrastructure is concentrated in Isfahan – also in the context of the nuclear program," Hayman said at the beginning of his remarks.

"There is a factory there for converting uranium and also a factory for the production of advanced centrifuges, as well as a factory for missiles and UAVs. In this case, apparently what was damaged was the missile factory," Hayman continued.

"America doesn't want to pay the price for other people's meals," Hayman added. "If they didn't carry out the attack, they're not willing to pay the price for it. When they do things, they have no problem bearing the reaction," Hayman explained regarding the potential culprit of the attack, which US officials said was an Israeli attack.
